As a futures trader, you should make sure that you understand very clearly what a short position is and a long position is. There are plenty of novice traders who believe that you only make money or are profitable when markets are on an upward trend. However, you need to understand that futures' trading constitutes a lot more than just following the upward market trend. You also should know by now that as a futures trader you can benefit greatly when you focus on asset types that have attained a climax and are close to failure. As a trader, anytime that you wage your money against an asset, then you will be said to be selling it short. Selling an asset short simply means that you will engage your broker and purchase the rights to access the asset with the hopes of selling it back later once it becomes profitable.
